MARIA NYANJARA SPEAKS OUT

An old Mukiga woman with a lined face and wrinkled arm, was sitting on a mat at the end of the compound. Maria determined to be heard, despite the men of the village.

Barefooted, she was dressed in a brown and blue apron tucked in at her waist with a scarf covering her hair. She had placed herself just outside the circle of half a dozen of male elders gathered to greet the visitors from Kabale town.

The guest officials from the Farmers Forum Association and the head of the village, sat on benches. Beyond the inner circle, thirty to fifty men, women and lots of children looked on, sometimes shouting comments. On the four sides of courtyard were mud-walled buildings with rust brown corrugated iron roofs.

Maria, one of the oldest and with one of the largest farms felt that she had a right to speak. "I am now 69 years old. I have three daughters and seven sons," she said. "A year ago, my husband died in a road accident. I single-handedly grow sorghum, cabbages, beans as well as irish potatoes on two farms totaling to about 15 hectares. I also have a poultry farm.
